

Basic Principles of Behavior

In order to fully appreciate how “understanding the functions or purpose of behavior” can make it possible to change, modify, or replace inappropriate behavior, it is first necessary that you understand some basic principles of behavior.

1. Behavior is related to its context. The things going on in our lives or in the immediate environment directly influence our behavior. For example, how do you think John would behave after being punched by another student? Would his test taking behavior be different if he was in a hot room? Could his behavior be affected if he didn't sleep last night?
2. Behaviors change as people mature and develop new skills and enter new environments and settings. For example, a person's behavior may change depending on whether they are at a formal dinner or attending a backyard barbeque. Similarly, most 12-year-old children don't act the same as 50-year-old adults
3. Behaviors have a “reason” for occurring. If behavior produces something positive it is likely to increase or be maintained. If not, it is likely to decrease. Therefore, any responses to behavior (consequences) may increase or decrease the occurrence of problem behavior
