These findings have important implications for the design of training programs for the use of the new technologies. First, the results suggest that the training should focus on the development of the cognitive skills required for the use of the new technologies, such as the ability to understand and interpret the information provided by the sensors and the ability to make decisions based on this information. Second, the results suggest that the training should be tailored to the specific needs of the operators, taking into account their level of experience and their specific tasks. Third, the results suggest that the training should be interactive and hands-on, allowing operators to practice the use of the new technologies in a realistic environment. Finally, the results suggest that the training should be ongoing, as the operators' skills and knowledge will continue to evolve as they use the new technologies.
