

THE COUNTERFEIT MEMORY

Today was Memorial Day, a Monday, and he had to work a twelve-hour shift starting at six p.m.

He usually takes about a two-hour break, and when he got to the building he decided to take the break right away. (Since this was a holiday he knew later it would be slow, so he could take another couple of hours without being missed.)

He went to Forty-Seventh Street, towards the Seventh Avenue side, and bought a ticket to three adult films playing at the Orleans Theatre. He didn't remember the titles for the movies, but one of them was something like I'm Not an Actress.

The Orleans is an old porno house, still charging $2.00 at all times, and always showing more than one movie. The films they show are low-budget, badly made, scratchy, and over-staged. They make absolutely no narrative sense, and have, for the most part, a sound track that's almost all music.

The theater was packed. Filled with almost all men. There are a lot of shifting about, with customers getting up and returning to their seats frequently. It's probably one of the more dangerous theaters in the city, and it seems like every ten minutes some guy starts yelling and threatening to tear the head from one of the ladies that keep peering above the railing. You get the feeling that someone is either about to get kidnapped or propositioned. Drugs and sex in the bathroom are still there, and there's lots of talking and shouting back to-the-screen. When you walk into one of these houses you usually come in while the movie is already in progress. It's a lot different from the usual method of attending a movie. First lines out of her there's a sequence of images up there, close-ups, huge details, of someone getting banged. You look at the screen and think (actually the reaction is more like darking), you try to adjust your sight to the darkness, and wait for the cone of light from the projector to get larger and brighter as you can find a seat without bothering anyone.

Selecting a seat is done quietly and becomes a little like making out a claim. It's important to maintain a certain balance, separating yourself from other customers so as not to spend what could be described as an audience "popped" throughout the theater.
