Insurance Coverage and Preventive Care Among Adults Lisa M. Lines, Matthew Urato, Michael T. Halpern, Sujha Subramanian, 2014-04-06 The Affordable Care Act ACA is intended to provide health insurance to all US citizens but many people will likely continue to have gaps in their insurance coverage after reform For this study we used longitudinal survey data from Panel 11 2006-2007 of the Medical Expenditure Panel Survey to examine the effect of gaps in insurance coverage on adults receipt of preventive screening We categorized individuals into 8 groups between the ages of 18 and 64 at baseline as continuously insured private only or any public intermittently insured or continuously uninsured Outcome measures were routine checkup blood pressure check cholesterol check flu shot sigmoidoscopy or colonoscopy mammogram Pap smear and an overall composite measure Logistic regression models controlled for age sex race limited English proficiency education urbanicity census region income perceived health and employment status Crude rates of receiving preventive services were generally highest for those with public insurance and lowest for the continuously uninsured In adjusted analyses having intermittent coverage increased the odds of receiving no preventive services to 1.64 compared with continuous private insurance Continuously lacking insurance increased the odds of receiving no preventive services to 4.41 compared with continuous private coverage The effect of intermittent coverage was larger than the effect of race ethnicity education where individuals lived perceived health status or employment status Lack of continuous health insurance is a critical barrier to receiving appropriate health care services Implementation of the ACA will be less successful if gaps in coverage are not prevented
