

The Interactive Electronic Technical Manual Overview "Setting the Stage"

by

Eric L. Jorgensen
Carderock Division, Naval Surface Warfare Center

ABSTRACT

This paper presents a general overview of DoD Interactive Electronic Technical Manuals (IETMs) and opens with a short discussion of the problems leading up to the need for IETMs, the general characteristics of an IETM, and an identification of the major research programs in the three Services leading up to IETMs. It then discusses the need for standards to define this new presentation medium and the general areas for which initial standards have been developed for "new start" weapons programs. However, with the close of the Cold War, many new-start programs have been delayed and the emphasis in DoD is on converting existing TMs into IETMs. The three services have developed a variety of applications to effect this conversion and the paper itemizes a set of categories or Classes to group the varying emerging applications of IETM-like and near-IETM systems. The paper includes a discussion of what is and what is not an IETM, and finishes with a call for standards for each of the emerging Electronic Technical Manual Classes.

The Existing Technical Manual Problem

The goal of true integration of the Technical Information (TI) in DOD weapon-system logistic-support systems is effectively impossible to obtain when the Services have to rely on paper-based Technical Manuals (TMs) for the great bulk of this information. In addition to contributing to the serious long-term logistics problems involved in producing, stocking, controlling, modifying, and using large quantities of paper, TMs as currently constructed are inherently incapable of incorporation into an automated, standardized, interactive, real-time system for the transfer and sharing of logistic-support information in a highly comprehensible form. Specifically, paper Technical Manuals are unnecessarily costly to produce and manage, are very difficult to integrate into an automated integrated logistics support system, and are of such poor usability and comprehensibility as to seriously slow up the maintenance process, increase false part-removal rates, and significantly increase training time.

To reduce the magnitude of these problems, major efforts are underway within the DOD to automate the paper-based TM production and management processes. However, existing TM automation attempts, although they may provide limited improvements at specific points in the logistics-support chain, cannot provide a full
