transparency principle and two examples of procurement systems where corruption is limited adequately without an excess of information procedural requirements Germany and Austria The book scrutinizes the transparency rules procurement participants and responsible institutions in the award of procurements in these countries It discusses in detail the types of infringements involving corruption as well as their link to infringements of the transparency principle It compares and examines the systems of control and appeal against a contracting authority s actions within the various legislative schemes and highlights the legislative weaknesses which fail to reduce corruption The comparative analysis between the Bulgarian public procurement system and the German and Austrian systems is carried out through detailed research not only with regard to adherence to the transparency principle but also to the use of other mechanisms to limit corruption insofar as these solutions are appropriate and could be adapted in other countries currently lacking sufficient anti corruption measures

Essays on Contract Design and Incentive Provision Eva I. Hoppe-Fischer, 2019-02-19 Contract theory which emphasizes the importance of unverifiable actions and private information has been a highly active field of research in microeconomics in the last decades This thesis is divided into two parts Part I consists of three chapters that study contract theoretic models which are motivated by the classic procurement problem of a principal who wants an agent to deliver a certain good or service In such models it is typically assumed that decision makers are interested in their own monetary payoffs only Moreover they have unlimited cognitive abilities and behave in a perfectly rational way Yet in practice people often do not behave this way While empirical research is very difficult in contract theory laboratory experiments have recently turned out to be an important source of data In Part II three experimental studies are presented that investigate contract theoretic problems brought up in Part I
