Aziz Ansari and Eric Klinenberg:
Modern Romance: An Investigation

New York: Penguin Press, 2015. 288 p.p. ISBN 978-01-431-0925-9

This review is as much about a new book by Aziz Ansari and Eric Klinenberg as it is about the overall phenomenon of scientific production for wider public. It is a timely topic because this “public sociology” text exists within an increasingly professionalized academic environment, where the notion of “publish or perish” is felt by everyone. In this environment, the questions around who are we publishing for and for what ends become even more significant. Even though there might be some exceptions to the rule, the problem of science, in our case sociology, entering the public domain is relevant, as it should be. So how can sociology be more reflexive of its public role? Perhaps by changing the conventional forms of scientific publications.

The book Modern Romance: An Investigation (2015), which I discuss in the following paragraphs, can be considered an example of sociological knowledge presented in a publicly accessible form (perhaps for some, too accessible). Of course, we may argue right from the beginning that this accessibility is the result of a very fortunate combination of an attractive topic, an author known from show-business, and no higher aims for deep theoretic inquiry. In short: the book is designed to “sell well”. Not underestimating this critique of marketed infotainment, the book in fact does sell well, with reviews published in respectable worldwide media outlets such as The New York Times, The Guardian and National Public Radio.

Modern Romance is a research book written by the American actor and stand-up comedian Aziz Ansari, with the scientific support of Eric Klinenberg, a sociologist based at New York University, who has worked with the themes of romance and singles before (e.g. Klinenberg 2012). The authors aim to investigate various aspects of romantic life in the era of digital technology, which has allowed dating possibilities that were “technically” not available before, such as dating websites and smartphone applications. Besides speaking about the intermediators of romantic relationships, Ansari and Klinenberg also comment on the growing individualism and social anxiety experienced by people “on the dating market” today. These trends certainly have appeared in connection with, even if they are not caused directly by, communications technology. Such anxiety is best illustrated by a model situation in which a person spends considerable time composing a text message to invite someone on a date, followed by an obsessive checking of the phone waiting for a reply. Even the reply to such an invite tends to follow certain arbitrary rules: the use of specific words and a delay in sending the message – all to make an impression that the sender is not “too eager”.
