

Performing Marginality: Comedy, Identity, and Cultural Critique

Joanne R. Gilbert

Stand-up comedy is a powerful form of autobiographical performance unique in its simultaneous construction of personal identity and cultural critique. This essay looks at the humor of comics Phyllis Diller and Roseanne Barr in order to explore the potentially subversive use of self-deprecation and to analyze the way these comics construct themselves and others as butt of jokes. Keywords: Marginality, Humor, Feminism, Identity, Barr, Diller

When I was performing stand-up comedy in New York in the mid-eighties, I was told several times by Comedy Club owners that I had too happy a childhood to be a stand-up comic. What they meant was that I was not foregrounding the trendy, angst-driven humor that characterized the acts of so many of my comedic colleagues. In essence, I was being told that I was not performing enough autobiography. And yet, even amidst the topical musings and witty oneliners, I was engaged in autobiographical performance. Like any comic, I was performing a version of myself that suited the audience and the occasion. What was it that made club owners perceive the performance of personal pain and anger as more "authentic" than the performance of humorous anecdotes about family members?

Performing autobiography is, in one sense, something we all do every day. When creating a staged, public autobiographical performance, however, we select bits and pieces of ourselves to share with an audience. In the genre of stand-up comedy, performers present a pastiche of observations and characters both real and imagined. At bottom, however, is the autobiographical self—a multifaceted, protean entity that encompasses both onstage and offstage personae. Stand-up comics simultaneously perform self and culture, offering an often acerbic social critique sanctioned as entertainment because it is articulated in a comedic context. Perhaps because of this cultural critique, stand-up comedy as a unique and powerful autobiographical form has been largely overlooked in the scholarship on autobiographical performance.

Female comics provide particularly interesting examples of autobiographical performance. Because they represent a group marginalized by the dominant (male) culture, female comics rhetorically construct and perform their marginality onstage. In so doing, they perform both self and culture, exemplifying for audiences the inevitable interdependence between personal and social identities. Because of the "us against them" nature of marginal humor (humor performed by any marginal group, e.g., African-American, gay/lesbian, Jewish comics etc.), marginal comics often construct themselves as victims. In so doing, however, they may subvert their own status by embodying the potential power of powerlessness. Their social critique is potent and, because it is offered in a comedic context, safe from retribution as well.
