Value chains for nutritious food: Analysis of the egg value chain in the Tigray region of Ethiopia Hirvonen, Kalle, Baye, Kaleab, Headey, Derek D., Hoddinott, John F., 2020-10-07

Eggs have high potential for improving nutrition outcomes in low income countries yet very few children in such settings consume eggs on a regular basis despite widespread poultry ownership To redress this disconnect a number of interventions have been implemented to improve household production of poultry products as well as caregiver awareness of the nutritional benefits of eggs and other animal sourced foods However very few of these interventions have tried to leverage food markets to improve nutrition even though most rural people predominantly rely on markets for the majority of their non staple food consumption This study was implemented to better understand the constraints to purchasing eggs for consumption by young children in rural Ethiopia with a view to informing the design of market oriented interventions that might cost effectively increase children's egg consumption To do so we analyzed secondary datasets on poultry ownership household and child egg consumption and retail egg prices to understand egg markets and the egg value chain in Tigray Similar to other contexts in sub Saharan Africa we find that two thirds of households own poultry though only one quarter of young children consumed eggs in the past 24 hours Although markets in Tigray are well integrated likely because of the important role of egg aggregators egg prices remain high A modest consumption level of 2.5 eggs per person per week would cost around 10 percent of the total budget of households in the poorest quintile of households even though eggs are more affordable than other animal sourced foods We find that egg consumption among young children is not constrained by fasting associated with Orthodox Christianity High prices are likely the main constraint and are a function of low levels of intensification in egg production which is dominated by backyard poultry systems characterized by high mortality rates and low productivity
