

How Do Bees Make Honey?

Bees are insects. This means they have an exoskeleton (a skeleton on the outside of their body), three main body parts, antennae on their heads, and three pairs of legs. Bees create honey, which is a nutritional, sweet, and healthy food for humans. The honey bee begins the process of making honey by sucking nectar from flowers. So how does a bee use this nectar to create honey?

The process begins with the honey bee drinking nectar from flowers. The honey bee has a long, specially adapted tongue to slurp up the nectar into one of their two stomachs. The long tongue that is used for drinking nectar is called a proboscis. The bee's stomach can weigh as much as the bee when it is full.

Inside the stomach, the nectar is stored in a special sac called a honey sac. Here, a special enzyme converts the nectar into two different sugars called fructose and glucose.

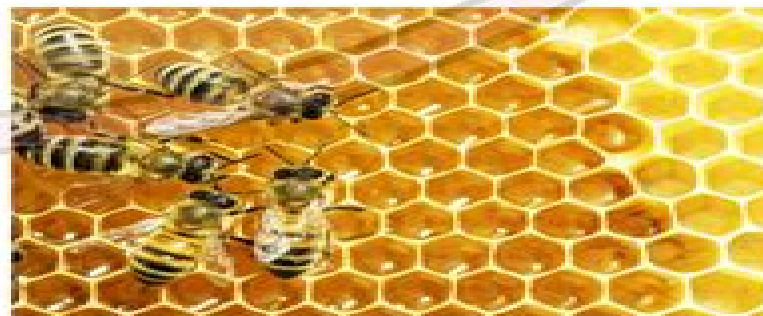

Once the bee's stomach is full, it will return to the hive and spit the liquid into other bees' mouths. The bees chew the liquid for a long time until it's turned into honey.

The bees then spit the honey into hexagonal storage cells called honeycomb cells. To get the liquid out of the honey, the bees flap their wings to create a fan effect, which causes the water to evaporate out of the honey.

The honey is then sealed in the storage cells with a beeswax lid. It can be stored forever in these cells, away from air and water. This means it can provide the bees with a food source throughout the winter months.

Conclusion

Honey is made when bees drink nectar from plants and turn this nectar into sugar inside their stomachs. This sugar is then emptied into honeycomb cells and fanned to dry out the liquid. There are many varieties of honey available on our supermarket shelves. These varieties each taste different because the bees drank nectar from different flowers before they created the honey.
