

From English Course Glossary

Reading practices: the process we use to make sense of a text. The particular values, assumptions and beliefs a reader holds will determine the particular meaning the reader makes from a text. Readers may consciously choose to use a reading practice by reading a text from a particular ideological perspective. When this is done it is possible to construct a reading that creates a contradictory meaning of a text to that created by a first reading of the text.

Reception: in this course, the term refers to a process where the reader actively makes meaning when reading or viewing a text using the reader's knowledge of the genre and history of the text. This meaning may be constructed by the reader using personal experiences as a reference point but these meanings generally remain within certain limits set by the text.

Repertoire: is a list of skills or reading practices that a student is able to use.

Representation: refers to the way people, events, issues or subjects are presented in a text. The term implies that texts are not mirrors of the real world; rather, a construction of a 'real world'. This construction is partially shaped through the writer's use of conventions and techniques.

Response/Investigation task: one of the types of assessment listed in the course. Students completing a unit must be assessed on their comprehension and interpretation of oral/visual/written texts. This response may include an investigation of the use of language in particular texts or contexts.

Resistant reading: a way of reading or making meaning from a text which challenges or questions the assumptions underlying the text. Resistant readings employ a discourse different from the dominant discourse. The classification of readings into alternative, resistant or dominant is quite arbitrary, depending on the ideology held by the reader.
