Contemporary Architecture in China Architectural Creation Magazine, 2011-03-10 Contemporary Architecture in China features new architecture by focusing on 30 structures built since 1999. These buildings located in ten different cities over a vast geographical area cover a wide variety of types from residential to commercial to public use. China's architecture can be seen as a mirror of the country's development as a whole. During China's reform and opening up in the past 30 years, the country and its architecture have undergone great changes, developing at an overwhelming speed. In the past ten years, in particular, as China has strengthened its global ties, it has also experienced increasingly close cooperation between Chinese and foreign architects. This communication and exchange of ideas has resulted in an impressive number of internationally recognized design projects. While introducing details of construction including date, location, use, and technical information, the book also focuses on the aesthetic contribution these innovative buildings have made to China's urban landscape. The book's abundant images further enhance the reader's understanding of architectural styles and design features. Developments in construction and engineering as well as trends in architectural design can also be traced, giving readers a better understanding of today's China and its dynamic architecture.

Constructing a Place of Critical Architecture in China Guanghui Ding, 2016-03-09 For the past 30 years, The Chinese journal Time Architecture Shidai Jianzhu has focused on publishing innovative and exploratory work by emerging architects based in private design firms who were committed to new material, theoretical, and pedagogical practices. In doing so, this book argues that the journal has engaged in the presentation and production of a particular form of critical architecture described as an intermediate criticality as a response to the particular constraints of the Chinese cultural and political context. The journal's publications displayed a dual critique: a resistant attitude to the dominant modes of commercial building practice characterised by rapid and large-scale urban expansion, and an alternative publishing practice focusing on emerging independent architectural practitioners through the active integration of theoretical debates, architectural projects, and criticisms. This dual critique is illustrated through a careful review and analysis of the history and programme of the journal. By showing how the work of emerging architects including Yung Ho Chang, Wang Shu, Liu Jiakun, and Urbanus are situated within the context of the journal's special thematic editions on experimental architecture, exhibition, group design, new urban space, and professional system, the book assesses the contribution the journal has made to the emergence of a critical architecture in China in the context of how it was articulated, debated, presented, and perhaps even produced within the pages of the publication itself. The protagonists of critical architecture have endeavoured to construct an alternative mode of form and space with strong aesthetic and socio-political implications to the predominant production of architecture under the current Chinese socialist market economy. To rebel against certain forms of domination and suppression by capital and power is by no means to completely reject them; rather, it is to use them.

Dwell, 2006-04 At Dwell, we're staging a minor revolution. We think that it's possible to live in a house or apartment by a bold modern architect to own furniture and products that are exceptionally well designed and still be a regular human being We think that good design is an integral part of real life And that real life has been conspicuous by its absence in most design and architecture magazines
