Abstract: Phragmites australis is a dominant species in coastal wetlands and is a major component of the marsh plant community. It is a highly invasive species and has been found to be a major component of the marsh plant community in many areas. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Phragmites australis on the marsh plant community. The study was conducted in a marsh in the coastal plain of Virginia. The marsh was divided into two sections, one with Phragmites australis and one without. The sections were monitored for a period of two years. The results of the study showed that the presence of Phragmites australis had a significant effect on the marsh plant community. The species diversity and abundance of the plant community were significantly lower in the section with Phragmites australis than in the section without. The results of the study suggest that Phragmites australis is a major component of the marsh plant community and has a significant effect on the marsh plant community.
