Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The physical and psychological health of the women was assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the women. The women in the walking program had significantly lower body mass index, waist circumference, and blood pressure, and significantly higher heart rate, stroke volume, and cardiac output than the women in the control group. The women in the walking program also had significantly lower levels of anxiety, depression, and stress, and significantly higher levels of self-esteem and quality of life than the women in the control group. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

CONCLUSIONS

It is concluded that the use of the proposed model for the design of a new generation of high speed trains is feasible. The model is able to predict the aerodynamic drag and the aerodynamic lift of the train in the range of the design speed. The model is able to predict the aerodynamic drag and the aerodynamic lift of the train in the range of the design speed. The model is able to predict the aerodynamic drag and the aerodynamic lift of the train in the range of the design speed.
