Fostering Human Capital in Tanzania's Rapidly Growing Population Mr. Sebastian Acevedo Mejia, 2025-07-18 Tanzania's human capital development needs are staggering and need to be addressed urgently to reap the benefits of the ongoing demographic transition. Almost half of Tanzanians are under 18 years of age and the population is projected to double to more than 130 million by 2050. Currently Tanzania lags its peers in terms of the coverage and quality of education and health services. This paper i takes stock of recent changes since the launch of the ECF program including improvements in priority social spending ii highlights the challenges to close current gaps in health and education and improve service delivery and iii provides some policy recommendations Iceland International Monetary Fund. European Dept., 2019-12-19 This 2019 Article IV Consultation with Iceland discusses that after years of robust growth economic activity has significantly weakened. Supply disruptions in tourism the engine of recent growth and the associated uncertainty have triggered a drop in domestic demand and an increase in unemployment. A swift policy response with fiscal relaxation and monetary easing has stabilized expectations and cushioned the effects. A moderate but fragile growth recovery is expected in 2020. Macroprudential measures are helping to preserve buffers for managing financial stability risks. Macroprudential policies are adequate given still elevated household debt and real estate prices and benign external financing conditions. Looking forward the macroprudential toolkit could be expanded to contain potential risks in the loan portfolio over the medium term. Ongoing education reforms would boost human capital and productivity. Greater transparency of large unlisted companies would preserve the business environment and strategic policies in tourism and fisheries would protect the sustainability of traditional economic sectors Philippines, Selected Issues ,1999 Compendium of HHS Evaluations and Relevant Other Studies ,1990
