

Working Together to Build Practices

Teaching can be a solitary act. It takes time to meet with other educators to discuss teaching and learning, and we all know how little time remains after a full day of classes, a lunch meeting, and a briefcase of marking. Discussions with other educators around teaching and learning do not, however, rob us of time. They sustain us; they make more valuable the time we spend teaching.

Each of us has arrived at this conclusion: collaboration is necessary to our survival as teachers. We share our struggles and listen to concerns. Simply knowing we'll be spending time with people who have similar questions and tensions provides support. We value connecting with one another—together we create a place where we can relax, maybe complain a bit, and then move on to restorative conversation and work.

The four of us have worked and continue to work with many different groups of educators. Our collaboration as a group of four is enriched by the work we do with others, including those in the original district study group where we met. Cross-pollination occurs through the myriad interactions we have with students, colleagues, and mentors. Talking together encourages us to explain why we do what we do; we become more informed when we collaborate. We can confidently take this knowledge and articulation into our work with others.

Collaboration can have a significant positive impact on the learning in our classrooms and schools.

Finding Ways to Work Together

Although we have had some successful collaborative experiences, these tended to be project-based, and we wanted to have a sustained collaborative community despite the fact that we all worked at different sites. Our individual desires to investigate two or three topics in depth led us to the realization that we needed to meet regularly to have the space and time to share, discuss, create, problem-solve, and plan together. We needed a way to delve deeply into the issues and practices that mattered to us the most, to see the bigger structures across the year and reporting periods, across our philosophies and styles.

Over the last five years, we have met together regularly to discuss a variety of topics, including literature for both ourselves and our students, relevant professional resources, and big ideas and issues related to teaching and education. Our collaborative inquiry is driven by our desire to improve classroom practice. Therefore what is discussed is also linked to the realities of our classrooms, our students, and our practice. Perhaps the most holistic or integrated activity we do is plan units together, which we adapt to the different grades and students we teach. We wrestle with theory and practice; this work propels us forward and

Working together helps us be more reflective, responsive, adaptive, and intentional. It helps us to engage deeply in our practice. When everyone knows why we are doing what we are doing, both in our classrooms with our students and in our planning, our work becomes more refined and purposeful, our actions more aligned with our goals. We see more success.
